Draft resolution III

Agreed conclusions of the Commission on the Status of Women on participation in and access of women to the media, and information and communication technologies and their impact on and use as an instrument for the advancement and empowerment of women*

The Economic and Social Council,

Endorses the following agreed conclusions adopted by the Commission on the Status of Women at its forty-seventh session with respect to participation in and access of women to the media and on information and communication technologies and their impact on and use as an instrument for the advancement and empowerment of women:

1. The Commission on the Status of Women recalls and reiterates the strategic objectives and actions of the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action²⁶ and the outcome document adopted at the twenty-third special session of the General Assembly entitled “Gender equality, development and peace in the twenty-first century”,²⁷ on the potential of the media and of information and communications technologies to contribute to the advancement and empowerment of women. It also recalls the United Nations Millennium Declaration²⁸ and its Development Goals to promote gender equality and the empowerment of women as effective ways to combat poverty, hunger and disease, to stimulate development that is truly sustainable and to ensure that the benefits of new technologies, especially information and communications technologies, are available to all.

2. The Commission notes that, globally, there are substantial differences in participation in, access to and use of media and information and communications technologies, their content and production. Such differences have important implications for policy development at national, regional and international levels. A focus on the gender dimensions of information and communications technologies is essential in order to prevent and combat any adverse impact of the digital revolution on gender equality and the perpetuation of existing inequalities and discrimination, including the sexual exploitation of women both through the traditional media and new technologies. The media and information and communication technologies also offer tools for enhancing women’s full access to the benefits of information and new technologies and can become central tools for women’s empowerment and the promotion of gender equality. Efforts are therefore necessary to increase women’s access to and participation in the media and information and communication technologies, including in their decision-making processes and new opportunities created through information and communication technologies.

3. The Commission welcomes the convening of the World Summit on the Information Society, which is to be held in Geneva in December 2003 and in Tunis in 2005, and urges all participants to take the following recommendations into account and to integrate gender perspectives in every facet of the Summit. It further encourages the participation of women in the Summit, to include significant numbers of gender equality experts and women experts in the field of information and communication technology as members of national delegations, organizations of civil society and the business community.

4. The Commission urges Governments and, as appropriate, the relevant funds and programmes, organizations and specialized agencies of the United Nations system, the international financial institutions, civil society, including the private sector and non-governmental organizations, and other stakeholders, to take the following actions:

(a) Prioritize the integration of gender perspectives and ensure women’s early and full participation in the development and implementation of national policies, legislation, programmes, projects, strategies and regulatory and technical instruments in the field of information and communication technologies (ICT) and media and communications, and create monitoring and accountability mechanisms to ensure implementation of gender-sensitive policies and regulations as well as to analyse the gender impact of such policies in consultation and collaboration with women information technology specialists, women’s organizations and gender equality advocates;

²⁸ General Assembly resolution 55/2.

(b) Encourage regulatory bodies, where they exist, to promote full participation of women in the ownership, control and management in the ICT and media sectors;

(c) Include gender perspectives and measurable gender-specific targets in all programmes and projects on ICT for development, as well as specific activities, as appropriate, for women and girls as active users of information;

(f) Support research into all aspects of the impact of the media and ICT on women and girls, in particular into their information needs and interests, review existing media and ICT policies and find ways to adapt ICT to the needs of poor and, in particular, illiterate women, in order to overcome barriers and support women's empowerment;

(g) Make education, formal and non-formal, a priority in particular for the development of ICT and take measures to promote girls' education so as to enable girls and women to gain access to ICT;

(h) Include, at appropriate levels of government, ICT education for girls and women in curricula at all educational levels, from early childhood to tertiary level, as well as in continuing education, in order to promote and ensure women's full participation in the information society;

(i) Take concrete steps to increase the number of female students at all educational levels in media- and ICT-related subjects, including science, mathematics and technology, including through such methods as distance- and e-learning;

(j) Establish or, where they already exist, expand skills training, vocational and employment training and capacity-building programmes for women and girls and women's non-governmental organizations on the use, design and production of ICT, including preparing them to take on leadership roles and promote their participation in the political process, and integrate a gender perspective in ICT training programmes for teachers and in training programmes for media professionals;

(k) Enable equal access for women to ICT-based economic activities, such as small business and home-based employment, to information systems and improved technologies and to new employment opportunities in this area, and consider developing tele-centres, information centres, community access points and business incubators;

(q) Encourage South-South cooperation to facilitate transfer and exchange of low-cost technologies and appropriate ICT content between developing countries for the benefit of women and girls;

(r) Strengthen and encourage the use of existing information and communication technologies, such as radio, television, telecommunications and print, in parallel in order to enhance the use of new technologies for gender equality and the economic, political and social empowerment of women as leaders, participants and consumers and recognize that women and girls are potentially large-scale consumers, users and producers of ICT and media;

(s) Collect, share, positively recognize and widely publicize good practices to counter gender stereotyping, negative portrayals and exploitation of women in all forms of the media and ICT as part of their efforts to eliminate discrimination and violence against women;

(t) Increase efforts to compile, and disaggregate by sex and age, statistics on ICT use, in order to develop gender-specific indicators on ICT use and needs and to collect gender-specific data on employment and education patterns in the media and in ICT professions;

(u) Provide adequate and appropriate resources for innovative, affordable, accessible and sustainable media and ICT programmes, projects and products that support gender equality and gender mainstreaming, are relevant to the concerns of women and girls and provide support to women's online communities and networks that promote gender equality;

Report of the Working Group on Communications on the Status of Women

10. At its 12th meeting (closed), on 12 March, the Commission considered the report of the Working Group on Communications on the Status of Women (E/CN.6/2003/CRP.6).

11. At the 14th meeting, on 14 March, the Commission took note of the report of the Working Group, and agreed to include it in the report of the Commission. The report of the Working Group is as follows:

1. The Working Group on Communications on the Status of Women was guided in its deliberations by the mandate given to it by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 76 (V), as amended by the Council in its resolutions 304 I(XI), 1983/27 and 1992/19.

2. The Working Group considered the list of confidential communications and replies by Governments (E/CN.6/2003/SW/COMM.LIST/37 and Add.1). There was no list of non-confidential communications concerning the status of women since no such communications had been received by the Secretary-General.

3. The Working Group considered the seven confidential communications received directly by the Division for the Advancement of Women and the 15 confidential communications received by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights concerning the status of women. It also took note of the fact that no confidential communications concerning the status of women had been received from other United Nations bodies or the specialized agencies.

4. The Working Group noted that there were replies from Governments to three of the seven communications received by the Division for the Advancement of Women directly and replies to 14 of the 15 communications transmitted by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights.

5. The Working Group recalls its mandate as defined in paragraph 4 of resolution 1983/27, which states that the Working Group is to meet in closed meetings during each session of the Commission in order that it may perform the following functions:

(a) Consideration of all communications, including the replies of Governments thereon, if any, with a view to bringing to the attention of the Commission those communications, including the replies of Governments, which appear to reveal a consistent pattern of reliably attested injustice and discriminatory practices against women;

(b) Preparation of a report, based on its analysis of the confidential and non-confidential communications, which will indicate the categories in which communications are most frequently submitted to the Commission.

6. Due to the limited number of communications received (22), it was not possible to make an assessment concerning the existence of a consistent pattern of reliably attested injustice and discriminatory practices against women. However, the Working Group discerned the following categories in which communications were most frequently submitted to the Commission:

(a) Sexual violence against women, including rape, perpetrated by State agents such as members of the police force, security forces, prison guards and members of the army;

(b) Violations of the rights of female human rights defenders, in particular the violation of the freedom of expression and assembly;

(c) Violations of the rights of women belonging to ethnic or religious minorities including killings, inhuman and degrading treatment and discrimination;

(d) Violations of women's human rights in the context of internal conflicts, including killings, torture and enforced or involuntary disappearances.

7. The Working Group was concerned about a communication indicating the existence of certain legal practices that prescribe cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment of women.

8. The Working Group noted that some of the communications transmitted under the confidential procedure governed by Economic and Social Council resolution 1503 (XLVII) were apparently still under consideration, while others appear to have been discontinued.

Chapter V

Follow-up to Economic and Social Council resolutions and decisions

Annex I

Panel discussion on participation in and access of women to the media, and information and communication technologies and their impact on and use as an instrument for the advancement and empowerment of women

Summary submitted by the moderator (Birgit Stevens (Belgium))

1. At its second meeting, on 3 March 2003, the Commission on the Status of Women held a panel discussion followed by a dialogue on participation in and access of women to the media, and information and communication technologies and their impact on and use as an instrument for the advancement and empowerment of women, one of the thematic issues of the Commission's forty-seventh session. The panellists were Carolina Aguilar Ayerra (Cuba), editorial director of "Women of Cuba"; Ammu Joseph (India), freelance journalist and media analyst; Rosalind Gill (United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland), lecturer at the London School of Economics; Concepción García Ramilo (Philippines), project manager for the Association for Progressive Communications Women's Networking Support Programme; and Sarbuland Khan, Director, Division for Economic and Social Council Support and Coordination, United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs. The panel was moderated by Birgit Stevens (Belgium).

2. Participants noted that the emergence of new information and communication technologies (ICT) and the profound changes in global media and communication systems posed opportunities and challenges for the promotion of gender equality. They emphasized the role of ICT and the media as tools for development and as central to the empowerment of women. These new media and ICT were increasingly used to share knowledge, enhance participation of all members of society, increase networking, give voice to marginalized groups, organize political action, empower people, fight poverty and enhance economic development. It was therefore particularly important to address gender-based discrimination and inequalities that undermine women's access to opportunities in the emerging knowledge and information society and diminish the potential of ICT and the media to be an effective tool for the promotion of gender equality.

3. A human rights approach framed the debate as participants placed emphasis on women's rights in the information society, with enhanced opportunities for democratic governance, the exercise of citizenship and full participation in development for all, based on rights to information and communication. Participants also made reference to the call in the United Nations Millennium Declaration (see General Assembly resolution 55/2) that ICT become available to all. As these technologies were seen as tools for the achievement of all the millennium development goals, their gender perspectives had to be addressed in their use.

4. Participants underlined that consideration of the role of media and ICT in the empowerment of women presented the Commission on the Status of Women with a crucial opportunity for enhancing attention to gender perspectives in the ongoing preparations for the World Summit on the Information Society and for ensuring that gender equality was at the centre of global discussions on the future of the information society. While the draft declaration that had emanated from the second session of the preparatory committee of the Summit (17 and 18 February 2003) paid some attention to gender perspectives and the priorities and needs of women, participants were very concerned about the absence of relevant actions from the draft plan of action. It would therefore be especially important for participants in the Commission, particularly for representatives from national machineries for the advancement of women, to work with their national delegations to the Summit to strengthen attention to gender perspectives in the process and in the outcome documents. The Commission's agreed conclusions, as well as relevant reports before the Commission, would be important instruments in ensuring the success of those efforts. Steps were also needed to increase the number of women, as well as of gender experts, in governmental, business and civil society delegations in all activities related to the Summit and its preparations.

5. Women's portrayal in the media remained an urgent challenge that had to be addressed across all regions and all types of media. It was noted that an increase in the number of women in media professions had not necessarily led to a less sexist or stereotyped portrayal of women in the media. New strategies were needed to increase awareness among all media professionals to change the images of women conveyed by the media, as well as to improve media content. This was especially necessary as sexist images and rhetoric had resurfaced in new media and in ICT. An increasing sexualization and normalization of pornography was now pervasive in all media, and the Internet was increasingly used to spread pornography and for trafficking of women and girls. Participants called for policies and adequate regulatory frameworks to address gender-based discrimination and, in particular, sexism in all media, as had already been proposed in the Beijing Platform for Action. At the same time, it was recognized that in any legislative and regulatory approach, a balance had to be found between women's rights and freedom of expression of the media and in ICT. Approaches used in other areas, such as the regulation of hate speech and licensing procedures, were mentioned as examples that could give guidance in this regard. The lack of or insufficient attention to gender perspectives in media and communication policies also had to be addressed.

6. While the preparatory process for the World Summit on the Information Society and other global and United Nations activities on ICT had highlighted the digital divide between and within countries and between rich and poor, urban and rural dwellers, young and old, and divides based on class, caste or ethnicity, little attention had so far been paid to the gender-based barriers and divides women encountered in access to and use of information and communication technologies. While most of the world's people remained without access to ICT, existing gender inequalities had made it even more difficult for women to gain such access. Participants identified the gender dimensions of a number of barriers, including those relating to the lack or inadequacy of infrastructure, costs, poverty and resources, literacy and educational levels and language.

7. In addition to access, participants emphasized the need to clarify women's information needs and to address questions of content available through the media and new technologies. Participants noted that information and communication technologies were tools that had to be integrated into women's lives rather than being pursued for their own sake. They should be adapted to women's needs and made part of all programmes, for example those aimed at enhancing women's education or health. Much of the information presently available through ICT was in English, and thus of limited relevance and use to the majority of women. This made it imperative to support the production of local content in local languages. Organizations that produced such local content aimed at the empowerment of women especially deserved assistance. Participants also called for research on women's information needs.

8. Many participants emphasized the importance and continuing usefulness of "old", traditional media and technologies, especially those that were not text-based, as tools for the empowerment of women. Women's initiatives in the area of community, traditional and alternative media should be recognized, supported and strengthened. Community radio was cited as an example and as a vital link for disseminating local information to communities not sufficiently served by other national media. Radio in particular was a means for poor women, especially in rural areas, to obtain information and to increase knowledge, and was considered by some to be a more useful tool than other technologies, especially in the short term.

9. Participants were concerned that little progress had been made in improving the trend of women's employment in the media, especially at the decision-making level. Issues such as high attrition rates of women in media professions worldwide required a range of measures, including the setting of goals and targets and the adoption of gender-sensitive policies in human resources management. The information society offered many new economic opportunities for women, but women had to overcome numerous barriers to take advantage of them. Unfavourable established patterns of women's employment were already being replicated in the field of ICT, where women were increasingly found in low-paying jobs. Participants called for measures to promote women's economic participation in the information society. Greater numbers of women and girls in science and technology were a critical prerequisite for ensuring that women not only acquired access to ICT, but also gained more control over such technologies and their production.

10. The changing environment in the global media and communication systems and the rapid developments in the ICT sector increased the urgency to integrate gender perspectives into legislation, policies and regulatory frameworks related to those sectors. So far, most national ICT policies, plans and programmes paid no attention to gender perspectives and were silent on women's priorities and needs. Gender analysis had to be undertaken at all stages of policy and programme development, from their initial design to implementation, monitoring and evaluation. Political will and leadership had been decisive in a number of countries to strengthen attention to gender perspectives in national ICT policies. An increase in financial resources was needed to improve infrastructure and increase women's access to ICT.

11. Participants called for the collection of data disaggregated by sex on the use of and access to ICT and the media in order to create a solid basis for informed policy-making. Apart from quantitative data, qualitative gender-specific indicators on various aspects of ICT use, access and dissemination, as well as on women's information needs, had to be compiled so that targeted responses could be developed. The establishment of measurable targets and benchmarks for gender equality in ICT was also recommended.

12. The work of the Economic and Social Council had been instrumental in putting ICT for development on the agenda of the United Nations. This work was of an inclusive and participatory nature that involved the contribution of all stakeholder groups. The United Nations ICT Task Force was based on a multi-stakeholder approach that involved Governments, the private sector and civil society and that included gender equality as one of its goals. A number of the most interesting and promising activities spearheaded by the working groups of the Task Force were women's projects.

13. Participants provided examples of good practices and shared ideas for enhancing the role of the media and ICT in the promotion of gender equality and women's empowerment. Awards for positive, non-sexist portrayals of women in the media were seen as an excellent incentive, but measures were also needed to ensure institutional adherence to non-sexist portrayals within media organizations. Incentive systems of different types could be pursued, and voluntary codes of conduct and guidelines on gender-sensitive and non-sexist reporting should be encouraged. Efforts were necessary to achieve adequate coverage in the media and ICT of women in political and leadership positions, especially also during election campaigns, as inadequate coverage of women by the media had been shown to be directly related to their underrepresentation in political office. Partnerships between government and civil society organizations helped in increasing women's access to ICT.

Panel discussion on women's human rights and the elimination of all forms of violence against women and girls as defined in the Beijing Platform for Action and the outcome documents of the twenty-third special session of the General Assembly

Summary submitted by the moderator (Fernando Estellita Lins de Salvo Coimbra (Brazil))

1. At its 3rd meeting, on 3 March 2003, the Commission on the Status of Women held a panel discussion followed by a dialogue on women's human rights and the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women as defined in the Beijing Platform for Action and the outcome document of the twenty-third special session, one of the themes of the forty-seventh session of the Commission. The panellists were Zhang Lixi (China), Vice President of China's Women's University; Vera Duarte Lobo de Pina (Cape Verde), Coordinator of the National Committee of Human Rights; Barbara Limanowska (Poland), Special Adviser on Trafficking for various international organizations; and Ayse Feride Acar (Turkey), Chairperson of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women.
2. The participants agreed that all forms of violence against women were a clear violation of women's human rights. Every day women and girls died as a result of various forms of sex-based violence.
3. Participants focused on domestic violence as one of the most widespread forms of violence against women. Domestic violence should not be regarded as an event between a man and a woman but should be dealt within the context of overall relations between women and men. Violence against women was a manifestation of unequal distribution of power between men and women within families and communities. Within families, women might be subordinate to men and be considered the property of their husbands and families. It was important to sensitize government officials, law enforcement officials, medical workers, social workers and society at large to domestic violence, its causes and ways and means to prevent it.
4. Participants stressed that, in addition to physical and sexual abuse, hidden forms of violence, such as psychological abuse, also needed to be addressed. Psychological abuse had a long-lasting, negative impact on victims' lives, damaging victims' self-esteem and confidence, destroying their dignity and respect as human beings, isolating them from the outside world and entrapping them in violent relationships.
5. Improvements in the response of social services in intervening in and preventing domestic violence against women had been observed in many parts of the world. However, a lot more needed to be done, and social services agencies had to be strengthened. Participants also stressed the need to provide for treatment programmes for male perpetrators and conduct community-based public education and "zero tolerance" campaigns. Efforts had to be undertaken, especially through the media, to change public attitudes towards domestic violence and disseminate information to the public on women's rights and the remedies available for violations of those rights. Involving men and boys in programmes to eliminate violence against women was considered essential.

6. Participants highlighted another form of violence that in the past ten years had reached worldwide proportions, namely trafficking in women and girls. Trafficking was acknowledged as a serious problem for countries of origin, transit and destination. Although initiatives had been taken to combat it, there was no evidence of a decrease in the phenomenon.

7. It was noted that the traditional law enforcement approach, based on bar raids by the police, was ineffective and counter-productive as it pushed trafficking deeper underground, making it impossible to gain access to trafficked women and girls, who were viewed as criminals rather than victims. The need to take a human rights approach to trafficking was underscored, especially in respect of strategies to identify and assist victims. Clear instructions for the police on how to treat actual and potential victims of trafficking were required, and cooperation between police and specialized non-governmental organizations in the victim identification process was considered essential.

8. The reintegration of victims of trafficking was discussed. Participants called for the provision of psychological support for victims suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder, as well as sustained economic and social support, including vocational training, the provision of jobs, microcredit and housing. Reintegration assistance had to be available to all returning victims of trafficking.

9. Participants recognized that non-governmental organizations had done a lot of work to combat trafficking but lacked capacity and resources, both of which should be strengthened. However, systems of long-term assistance to victims and integration programmes were possible only if Governments played the leading role in anti-trafficking activities, including through development and coordination of national plans of action to combat trafficking, which should involve governmental and non-governmental actors, at both national and international levels.

10. Participants stressed the need to address the root causes of trafficking, including the economic situation of countries of origin, especially countries with economies in transition where changes in the economic structure had had a predominantly negative impact on women. Effective prosecution measures were necessary, and ratification of the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children, which supplements the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, should be encouraged.

11. Participants also underlined that women and girls were particularly vulnerable to all forms of violence and other human rights violations during armed conflict, and that special attention had to be given to their situation.

12. During the discussion, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women was given particular attention. It was noted that some progress had been made in its implementation at the national level, particularly in the areas of new legislation, growing awareness and sensitivity, and the strengthening of national machineries for the advancement of women. However, participants stressed that States were far from having reached a shared notion of women's human rights as contained in the Convention, the Beijing Platform for Action and the outcome document of the twenty-third special session of the General Assembly. Participants indicated that many States continued to have laws discriminating against women, including those governing marriage, administration of marital property, divorce, inheritance, and the family. Moreover, it was recalled that many States continued to have reservations with regard to the Convention which undermined the object and purpose of the Convention.

13. Participants referred to what they saw as an emerging negative trend in the implementation of women's human rights in the present globalized world, namely that in a number of societies, so-called respect for traditions, culture or religion of minorities appeared to impede the vigorous protection of women's human rights. It was stressed that discriminatory traditions that violated women's human rights had to be changed. In that regard, participants underscored the universality of women's human rights.

14. Participants also stated that there was growing recognition in the international arena that discrimination was multifaceted and complex. Much needed to be done to recognize and eliminate the multiple and intersecting forms of discrimination faced by women around the world.

15. The role of the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women in ensuring a more effective implementation of the Convention was also pointed out. The Optional Protocol, which entered into force in 2000 allowed individual women and groups of women to complain to the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women of violations of their rights under the Convention. National-level awareness raising and capacity-building were considered critical for this instrument to be utilized effectively.

16. Participants also referred to the work under way towards the adoption of a regional human rights instrument, the protocol to the African Charter on Human and People's Rights, which would help promote and protect women's human rights in Africa. The protocol should complement current international human rights instruments and would be particularly instrumental in combating social practices and legislation that discriminated against women, including in the area of violence against women.

17. Participants provided some examples of good practices and shared ideas on necessary measures to combat violence against women. Good practices included the provision of social security benefits to battered women and the development of indicators to gather reliable information on the occurrence of gender-based violence, with a view to formulating appropriate policies to combat violence against women. Efforts were necessary to pass and enforce legislation on all forms of violence against women and girls, as well as to ensure that women and girls were aware of their rights and the remedies available for the violation of such rights. Changing gender-role stereotypes through education and awareness-raising programmes and addressing the root causes of violence, including through poverty-reduction measures, were also considered fundamental.

Annex III

High-level round table of the Commission on the Status of Women on national experiences in institutional capacity-building

Summary submitted by the chairperson (Othman Jerandi (Tunisia))

1. At its fourth meeting, on 4 March 2003, the Commission held a high-level round table (decision 46/101) on the theme of national experiences in institutional capacity-building, in particular in relation to the two themes examined by the Commission, that is, participation and access of women to the media, and information and communication technologies and their impact on and use as an instrument for the advancement and empowerment of women; and women's human rights and the elimination of all forms of violence against women and girls as defined in the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action and the outcome document of the twenty-third special session of the General Assembly. The high-level round table was an opportunity for a dialogue primarily among senior representatives of national machineries for the advancement of women attending the forty-seventh session of the Commission from capitals. A discussion guide prepared by the Bureau of the Commission supported the dialogue (E/CN.6/2003/CRP.3). One Deputy Prime Minister, four ministers, nine vice-ministers, state secretaries and directors-general/secretaries-general, and 13 other senior representatives from national machineries for the advancement of women participated in the interactive dialogue.

2. Participants welcomed the convening of the high-level round table and saw it as a very good initiative to exchange views and national experiences in institutional capacity-building for the advancement of women.

3. Participants discussed the organizational and structural evolution of national machineries, which in many instances had accelerated after the Beijing Fourth World Conference on Women (1995). The examples revealed a great diversity of such machineries. Participants noted that structures and mandates responded to the particularities of countries, but also influenced the effectiveness of the mechanisms. Speakers noted that the preparatory process, the Fourth World Conference on Women, held in Beijing in 1995, and the Beijing Platform for Action had noticeably strengthened the role of national machineries. Since then, a number of governmental mechanisms with responsibility for promotion of gender equality and advancement of women had been upgraded or been moved to more strategic locations. Others had been strengthened through legislation or decrees. The mandates of a number of mechanisms had been further enhanced and clarified. The consideration of reports by the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women had also had positive effects on the status of national machineries.

4. Institutional arrangements for the advancement of women included full-fledged ministries for gender equality, or ministries that included gender equality among other responsibilities. Other countries had state secretariats, bureaux attached to presidential or prime ministerial offices, while still others had established departments for gender equality. Responsibility for gender equality was sometimes assigned to different ministers on a rotating basis, with the support of expert departments, or shared between ministries and departments. In many countries, national machineries had decentralized structures, with offices or branches at regional, provincial and/or district level to ensure attention to gender equality issues at all levels of government and to link with women's groups at the grass-roots level, especially in rural areas. In many countries, governmental mechanisms were supplemented by advisory councils, ombudspersons and other advocacy and monitoring institutions to enhance promotion of gender equality.

5. Increasingly, the role of national machineries was to support the implementation of the gender mainstreaming strategy. Participants underlined that because of the cross-cutting, or transversal, nature of gender issues, all ministries had responsibility for gender equality and were required to use the gender mainstreaming strategy to promote gender equality. Consequently, national machineries worked in coordination with all, or a selected number of, ministries and government agencies and were responsible for evaluation, monitoring and follow-up. It was also noted, however, that even when a satisfactory structure was in place, a machinery's functionality could be limited by lack of or insufficient power to influence or pressure ministries to address gender dimensions in their work. Participants suggested that the mandates of national machineries should be regularly reviewed and adjusted in order to respond to new challenges and global developments.

6. The use of the gender mainstreaming strategy was leading to adjustments in the role and functions of national machineries. Such machineries increasingly acted as "watchdogs" for gender equality and were called upon to ensure that assessments were made of the impact of all decisions and public policies on women and men before their adoption, rather than being implementing entities for specific activities for women. Others emphasized the continuing need for national machineries to advocate for the interests and needs of women and to demand the implementation of activities and policies targeted to women. Many national machineries continued to execute such particular activities for women. These included awareness-raising, capacity-building, and training.

7. Participants stressed that the coordination and monitoring role of the national machinery was greatly facilitated and enhanced when clear directives on gender equality had been issued from the highest level of Government, i.e. the President or Prime Minister, to all Government entities. Line ministries and government agencies in a number of countries had adopted gender equality policies and strategies and instituted gender offices or appointed gender focal points to enhance implementation of such policies. In a number of countries, steering committees or inter-ministerial working groups had been established to support government-wide use of the gender mainstreaming strategy and to identify and address challenges and obstacles. Regular reporting requirements by ministries at national levels had also been established to enhance accountability.

8. While many challenges remained in ensuring awareness about the requirements of gender mainstreaming, it was proving even more difficult to create the necessary capacity for undertaking gender analysis systematically in all governmental work. Participants emphasized that political will and relevant gender mainstreaming policies had to be complemented by technical capacity and expertise to undertake gender analysis in all sectoral areas. To that end, tools, methodologies and indicators and handbooks on gender mainstreaming for different ministries had been prepared to strengthen gender analysis and to establish benchmarks for assessing progress. Competence development and training were important aspects for enhancing the capacity in the public sector. In one country, all ministers, including the prime minister, had undergone relevant training. Various incentive systems had also been put in place to increase attention to gender perspectives in government agencies. Other participants noted that lack of adequate analytical and diagnostic capacity continued to hamper progress in gender mainstreaming and the implementation of the Beijing Platform for Action.

9. Several participants discussed experiences with gender-sensitive budgeting as a way for ensuring that public resources benefited women and men equally, and that women's interests and needs received appropriate attention. Participants were concerned about the very limited financial and human resources available to some national machineries, not only for specific activities for women, but also for its coordination and catalytic functions. In many cases the percentage of the national budget assigned to the national machinery was disproportionately low or, in cases of ministries with joint portfolios such as women and children's affairs, resource allocation within the ministry was uneven. National machineries were also working with international and regional organizations to increase capacity and expand activities in support of gender mainstreaming.

10. Promotion of gender equality required cooperation and collaboration with different stakeholders, especially as achievement of gender equality was a societal responsibility. Cooperation and collaboration with political parties, parliament and civil society, including non-governmental organizations, facilitated enactment and implementation of gender equality legislation. National machineries frequently worked with women's groups to implement projects and specific activities, and to reach women in remote and rural areas. Cooperation with the private sector was also increasingly undertaken to achieve stated goals. Cooperation with relevant stakeholders was especially important to ensure implementation of national action plans for gender equality.

11. Information and communication technologies could assist in such collaboration and promote good governance and democracy as it opened up and facilitated communication between the government decision makers and legislators on the one hand, and civil society on the other. The media had an important role in raising awareness about gender issues, to combat stereotypes and strengthen commitment to gender equality.

12. Participants gave examples of practical activities for the achievement of gender equality, especially in the areas of violence against women, and the use of ICT. Female-staffed police stations and crises centres had been established to assist women victims of violence. Resources were being invested to train judges and enhance women's access to justice. Gender-sensitive legislation on immigration and refugee protection had been drafted, using tools of gender analysis, as had other legislation aimed at fighting violence against women, including harmful traditional practices. Training activities about violence against women had helped in bringing this issue into the public realm and implementing measures to combat such violence. The practice of honour killings had been publicly condemned. The appointment of independent rapporteurs at the national level on issues such as trafficking in women and girls was presented as an example of good practice. One-stop crisis centres had been established in hospitals for victims of violence against women. Resources had been provided towards the prevention and elimination of trafficking in women and girls.

13. Other examples of activities focused on eliminating hunger, the reduction of women's poverty and supporting women in rural and remote areas, including through the provision of microfinance. The World Solidarity Fund for poverty eradication and the promotion of human and social development in developing countries was mentioned as a possible channel for supporting ICT-related activities for women. Resources had been provided and public-private partnerships had been established to increase women's access to ICT. Measures had been taken to reduce women's illiteracy. Several participants mentioned that the number of women in political office had increased, which had facilitated the gender mainstreaming efforts. Training was provided to first-time women office holders.

14. The high-level round table greatly benefited from the participation of high-level representatives from capitals and from the interactive dialogue that took place among ministers and other senior officials with responsibility for promotion of gender equality at the national level. The exchange of experiences and information was seen as a very valuable innovation of the forty-seventh session of the Commission, and participants were invited to continue this exchange of good practices, lessons-learned and obstacles encountered in institutional capacity-building among national machineries in the months ahead. The Chairperson expressed his hope that the Commission would build on this first effort and enhance the interactive character of the dialogue at future sessions, in order to improve the Commission's working methods and enhance its role as a central intergovernmental body for the follow-up to and implementation of the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action and the outcome document of the twenty-third special session of the General Assembly of 2000.
