Consideration of reports submitted by States parties under article 18 of the Convention (continued)

Combined fourth to eighth periodic reports of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines (CEDAW/C/VCT/4-8; CEDAW/C/VCT/Q/4-8 and Add.1)

1. At the invitation of the Chairperson, the delegation of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines took places at the Committee table.

2. Ms. Ellis Browne (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines), introducing the combined fourth to eighth periodic reports of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines (CEDAW/C/VCT/4-8), said that the report had been drafted in accordance with the Committee's guidelines. Her Government had taken into consideration the concluding observations issued by the Committee following its consideration of the State party's previous report, in 1997, and had sought to address the Committee's concerns and recommendations in the current report. Her country's archipelagic geography presented specific challenges in terms of the delivery of services and the participation of the whole population in programmes to benefit women and girls. Nevertheless, since 2010 many improvements had been made in transportation, communication and the reach of basic services. The population stood at about 108,000 and was predominantly rural. It was almost equally divided between women and men, and 30 per cent of the population was under 15 years of age.

3. Since 2010, the country had been rocked by severe external shocks, including the global economic recession and a series of natural disasters. The Government continued to design and implement programmes to reduce poverty, which was its overarching development objective. The level of abject poverty had been drastically reduced from 1996 to 2008, and the country's human development index had increased in recent years.

4. The Government had launched the National Economic and Social Development Plan 2013-2025, which was a comprehensive strategy that included the goal of enabling increased human and social development. Rural farming populations, large families and single-parent, female-headed households had been identified as at-risk groups in need of more comprehensive poverty reduction strategies. Women were disproportionately affected by the economic downturn, as they experienced higher rates of unemployment and bore more responsibility for caregiving work. Programmes were being implemented through the Plan to address those issues.

5. The recently completed national review of the progress made in implementing the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action had provided an opportunity to take stock of programmes for women and reenergize them. Saint Vincent and the Grenadines had made progress towards achieving several of the Millennium Development Goals, though much remained to be done regarding Goal 3 (Promote gender equality and empower women). Gender-based violence continued to be of great concern. Measures taken to address the problem included an educational campaign against domestic violence, the adoption of the new Domestic Violence Act in 2015, more targeted data collection and policy coordination, and increased community-based training and education programmes to create changes in attitudes.

6. Gender-based violence and poverty reduction were both strategic priorities for the Government. With regard to gender-based violence, the Government had taken various measures to improve the legislative and regulatory framework, such as the development of a national gender action plan on ending gender-based violence. The post-2014 agenda included implementing that plan and developing a social protection policy to support women and children from vulnerable groups. Women's access to quality education and health care had been improved, and further efforts would be made to increase women's access to male-dominated fields of study and employment. The establishment of a national shelter for victims of domestic violence constituted a major development to improve support for women, and the further efforts planned in that area included the implementation of a training programme for the police, courts and other bodies on delivering services to women and children who faced violence and abuse.

7. As for improving support for women as leaders in the public and private sectors, the Government had already raised awareness of gender mainstreaming in education and employment, and it intended to develop a gender mainstreaming strategy to increase access for women in marginalized areas.

8. The National Council of Women, which was the main non-governmental organization (NGO) representing women in the country, had called on the Government to take a number of measures to improve the situation of women and girls. Some of those issues were already being addressed, and the Government would continue to engage in dialogue with the National Council of Women and to provide it with financial support.

9. The Government's efforts to combat poverty among women focused on training and job creation. The number of women employed in the agricultural sector was decreasing as more women were taking advantage of increased access to education and training at the secondary and tertiary levels. The forthcoming opening of the new airport would undoubtedly provide increased employment for women by strengthening the agriculture and tourism sectors.

10. The Government was committed to the continued expansion of social infrastructure, including subsidized land and housing and various social protection schemes, such as a direct cash transfer programme that primarily benefited elderly women and female caregivers. Single mothers could apply to the Family Court to secure a maintenance order requiring the father of their children to provide child support. Though much had been done in that regard, the enforcement of such orders remained a challenge. There was also a need to conduct an in-depth gender analysis of poverty and to raise public awareness of the impact of poverty among women on future generations.

Articles 1 to 6

11. Ms. Ameline said that, despite the Government's efforts, the situation of women in the State party remained alarming. She asked why it had taken so long for the State party to submit its report, and she wished to know how the Committee could assist the State party not only in drafting future reports but also in adopting the policies and laws necessary to fulfil its obligations under the Convention. Given the rejection of the bill for a new constitution in 2009, she asked whether any further legislative initiative of that kind had been launched since that time.

12. During the universal periodic review process, the State party had committed to ratifying the Optional Protocol to the Convention and accepting the amendment to article 20, paragraph 1, of the Convention concerning the meeting time of the Committee. She noted, however, that it had not yet done so and asked whether it would fulfil that commitment by the end of 2015. She asked what specific steps the Government would take to inform the general public about the Committee's forthcoming concluding observations and recommendations. Noting that many discriminatory laws remained in force, she asked what measures the Government would take to eliminate such discrimination and what role Parliament would play in those efforts. Lastly, she noted that there was no national human rights commission in Saint Vincent and the Grenadines.

13. Ms. Finch Burke (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that her Government had received assistance from UN-Women when drafting the report and that it would welcome further assistance with policy development and the drafting of future reports.

14. Ms. Ellis Browne (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that the delay in the submission of the report had been due in part to a lack of resources, as well as the restructuring of the Gender Affairs Division. Since 1998, the Government had been working on many fronts and had chosen to focus on practical measures and the delivery of immediate services.

15. Ms. Finch Burke (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that, since the proposed new constitution had been rejected, gender equality issues would instead be addressed through specific legislation on family law matters.

16. Ms. Ellis Browne (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that there were currently no plans to submit another bill on a new constitution.

17. Ms. Finch Burke (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that the Government had already informed the public, via the media, about the current dialogue with the Committee and that it would continue to raise awareness of the Committee's work through its campaigns to combat gender-based violence.

18. Ms. Ameline asked whether there was any mechanism in place, such as a parliamentary working group, to review and abolish discriminatory laws.

19. Ms. Finch Burke (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that, following the adoption of laws to protect children, an exercise had been carried out to harmonize the regulatory framework and amend any provisions that were at variance with the new legislation. The same process would be carried out in relation to the recently adopted Domestic Violence Act.

20. Ms. Ellis Browne (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that the Government tended to espouse the initiatives of the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States, which had included preparing a model bill to address the issue of domestic violence. An informal working group composed of representatives of civil society and government agencies had been set up to discuss the bill in question but had never been accorded the status of a formal mechanism. Following the adoption of the model domestic violence bill, no further pieces of legislation concerning women's rights had been tabled for consideration by Parliament. There was no national human rights institution or government agency responsible for human rights in Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, nor was it planned to set up such an institution at that time. However, the Saint Vincent and the Grenadines Human Rights Association was an NGO working in the area of human rights.

21. Ms. Patten asked whether the State party had a monist legal system under which international human rights conventions could be automatically incorporated into domestic law and be directly invoked and applied by the national courts. If that was not the case, had the State party sought technical assistance to transpose the Convention into its domestic legal order? Was there a commission responsible for identifying discriminatory laws and bringing them into conformity with the Convention? Were judicial officers provided with training on the Convention? Was the Convention frequently invoked by judges and lawyers?

22. Ms. Bailey said that the rejection of the bill for a new constitution had prevented a definition of discrimination against women from being introduced into the State party's domestic legislation. The Committee viewed the absence of such a definition as a major cause for concern. She asked how the State party planned to remedy that situation.

23. Ms. Ameline said that article 13 of the Constitution, which prohibited gender-based discrimination, needed to be strengthened. Discrimination against women took many forms and pervaded all sectors of society. Gender-based violence was only one such form. There was a pressing need for the State party to adopt legislation that took up the definition of discrimination against women enshrined in the Convention and that recognized and protected all women's rights.

24. Ms. Ellis Browne (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that the country had a dualist legal system requiring international human rights conventions to be translated into domestic law. Regrettably, that process had not yet taken place and it was unclear when it would begin. Judicial officers had received training on the Convention. While the Convention had not yet been incorporated into the domestic legal order, a number of high court judges had begun to refer to the Convention in their rulings, which was a positive development. The Government hoped that the trend in question would continue and that the purposes and principles of the Convention would become more widely known. Following the rejection of the bill for a new constitution, no new legislation containing a definition of discrimination against women had been drafted. If the bill for a new constitution was to be reintroduced, it would have to be put to a public referendum once more. However, there were no plans to reintroduce the bill in the near future.

25. Ms. Bailey said that, according to the State party's report, the Convention had never been referred to in any high court ruling. She asked when high court judges had started referring to the Convention in their rulings.

26. Ms. Ellis Browne (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that high court judges had begun referring to the Convention in their rulings after the end of the period covered in the report. There were currently no plans to consolidate the country's legal framework or to review laws that were deemed discriminatory against women. The adoption of the bill for a new constitution would have triggered such processes.

27. Ms. Pomeranzi asked how the State party's poverty reduction strategy benefited women; whether the Gender Affairs Division played a role in implementing that strategy; and why so few budgetary resources were allocated to the Gender Affairs Division given the breadth of its mandate. She requested the delegation to indicate the nature of the support provided by the Gender Affairs Division to the National Council of Women and the nature of their cooperation. She enquired as to the institutional status enjoyed by the Gender Affairs Division within the government architecture and as to how it managed to fulfil its mandate in the absence of a fully articulated gender mainstreaming policy. Lastly, she asked what progress had been achieved in mainstreaming the gender perspective in the different government ministries and agencies.

28. Ms. Haidar said that the information on temporary special measures contained in the State party's report revealed a possible misunderstanding of the nature and purpose of such measures. She referred the State party to the Committee's general recommendation No. 25 on temporary special measures for more detailed information. It was also important not to conflate the temporary special measures aimed at accelerating de facto equality between men and women, referred to in article 4, paragraph 1, of the Convention, with general measures aimed at improving the situation of women and girls in the country. The temporary special measures referred to in article 4, paragraph 1, applied to all areas covered by the Convention and included the introduction of quota systems intended to increase the number of women in elected and appointed decision-making bodies and other measures of positive discrimination. For example, the 2010 Protection of Employment Act, which specifically prohibited the dismissal of a woman on the grounds of pregnancy or issues related to maternity leave, was a special measure to protect maternity under article 4, paragraph 2, of the Convention, not a temporary special measure under paragraph 1. Temporary special measures could also provide the State party with an opportunity to remedy the effects of past discriminatory practices. She asked how the State party planned to raise awareness and promote the adoption of temporary special measures in the areas where they were needed most.

29. Ms. Finch Burke (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that, since 2010, the Gender Affairs Division had made the transition from advocacy for women's rights to overall responsibility for gender mainstreaming and development of gender policies in all government departments. The poverty reduction strategy included objectives that specifically targeted vulnerable women and children. Complementary initiatives had also been launched to guarantee single-parent families access to social protection. The lack of budgetary resources allocated to the Gender Affairs Division was offset by the separate resources allocated for the implementation of the different departmental gender policies and gender mainstreaming initiatives following the country's decision to introduce gender-sensitive budgeting. The Government was in the process of devising a formal and comprehensive gender mainstreaming policy aimed at improving the overall situation of women in Saint Vincent and the Grenadines.

30. The National Council of Women received a government subsidy to help cover its operating costs; together with other women's organizations, it worked in partnership with the Gender Affairs Division, which was responsible for coordinating all activities relating to the promotion and protection of women's rights and preventing duplication of effort in that area.

31. Ms. Ellis Browne (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that gender-sensitive budgeting still posed a challenge and that training on that subject was being provided to the officials responsible for budgeting in the Ministry of Finance. The Government hoped that, over time, the officials in question would develop a better understanding of the principles of gender-sensitive budgeting and apply them more effectively.

32. No quota systems were currently in place to increase the participation of women in the public and political life of the country. However, the delegation would highlight the importance of adopting such temporary special measures to policymakers on its return to Saint Vincent and the Grenadines and would make a number of proposals in that regard. It would then be up to the policymakers to carry those proposals forward.

33. Ms. Bailey asked when the State party's gender mainstreaming policy would be finalized and disseminated to all relevant stakeholders.

34. Ms. Pomeranzi said that training on gender-sensitive budgeting should follow the adoption of a formal gender-sensitive budgeting strategy. She asked whether the State party had considered conducting a gender budgeting analysis to help organize its efforts in that area.

35. Ms. Haidar said that the introduction of quota systems to increase women's participation in public and political life was important, but was not the only temporary special measure from which the State party could benefit. Consideration should also be given to adopting temporary special measures to promote the economic empowerment of vulnerable women and improve their access to the labour market.

36. Ms. Finch Burke (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that the country's recently completed country gender assessment had informed its approach to gender mainstreaming. In the past, the possibility of introducing quota systems had been raised not only in the political context but also in the context of women's economic empowerment and the need to afford them equal access to the labour market.

37. The Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States had provided training on gender-sensitive budgeting to the officials responsible for budgeting in the Ministry of Finance and to the staff of the Gender Affairs Division so that they could begin to introduce that form of budgeting with the assistance of a number of United Nations agencies. The Government had started the process of restructuring the national budget to facilitate the introduction of gender-sensitive budgeting, which would be kept separate from child budgeting and other forms of social budgeting. The results of the restructuring process would be reflected in the national budget for the next fiscal year. Furthermore, gender equality had become a key pillar of the national social development policy. The Government acknowledged that effective gender mainstreaming was necessary to give effect to the findings and recommendations of the country gender assessment.

38. Ms. Acosta Vargas asked what measures the State party was taking to combat harmful stereotypes, for instance in relation to women in common-law marriages and pregnant girls. Did such stereotypes dissuade women from reporting gender-based violence? She asked whether marital rape was legally recognized under the Domestic Violence Act, which had extended the definition of domestic violence to include physical, psychological, sexual and economic violence. Did the provisions of the Act apply to relationships outside marriage or to same-sex couples? Did they address the non-enforcement of protection orders issued by family courts? Citing reports that the Act placed an economic burden on victims, she asked whether any free legal aid programmes for women existed. The State party should provide information on the main outcomes of the National Action Plan on Gender-based Violence, as well as on the Crisis Centre and any plans to open more centres. Had it assessed the impact of its campaigns to raise awareness of gender-based violence? Lastly, she enquired whether the State party monitored non-domestic forms of violence, such as rape and femicide.

39. Ms. Arocha Domínguez expressed concern about the lack of information on traffic in women and exploitation of prostitution of women provided in the State party's report (CEDAW/C/VCT/4-8) and written replies to the list of issues (CEDAW/C/VCT/Q/4-8/Add.2). Noting that some perpetrators of sexual abuse paid the families of their victims to avoid prosecution and/or continue abusing the victims, she asked what steps were being taken to protect the victims of such abuse and to prosecute the perpetrators.

40. Noting that there was often a link between tourism and prostitution, she asked what steps the State party was taking to prevent the prostitution of minors. Was it monitoring tour operators to ensure that they did not encourage sex tourism? Given that prostitution was punishable under the Criminal Code, she asked how many convictions for prostitution had been handed down and whether it was the prostitute or the person exploiting the prostitute who had been prosecuted. What sort of support was provided to women who wished to abandon prostitution? What measures were being taken to combat traffic, specifically in girls and women?

41. Lastly, noting that women were often used to traffic drugs, she asked the State party to provide information on female drug mules and the measures taken to tackle the problem.

42. Ms. Finch Burke (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines), in response to a question from Ms. Acosta Vargas, said that the Government had conducted campaigns to combat harmful stereotyping in relation to pregnant girls in schools and communities and intended to carry out awareness-raising activities nationwide. Moreover, support for teenage mothers in terms of social protection measures and access to education had improved.

43. The Domestic Violence Act contained the definition of domestic violence established by the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States, which applied to relationships outside marriage and to couples living in separate residences, but not to same-sex couples. Moreover, it covered all forms of violence, including intimidation, which was now a criminal offence and was punishable. With regard to protection orders, she said that the Act provided for interim and permanent protection orders with a maximum duration of 28 days and 3 years, respectively.

44. Increased legal aid for victims of domestic violence was still under consideration. As to the outcomes of the National Action Plan on Gender-based Violence, the Cabinet had only recently approved the Plan, and the Government was now in the process of funding and implementing it. The Crisis Centre offered both residential and non-residential programmes, and additional victim support centres had been established. The Government had assessed some of its initiatives, but not its campaigns to raise awareness of gender-based violence.

45. Lastly, the Government had developed a number of awareness-raising programmes that targeted men, including a rehabilitation programme for perpetrators of violence against women and children.

46. Ms. Ellis Browne (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines), in reference to a question from Ms. Acosta Vargas, said that while family courts issued protection orders, the police were responsible for their enforcement. The police usually responded to alleged violations in a prompt manner, but did not always strictly enforce protection orders when the women concerned reunited with their estranged husbands for economic reasons and only asked for the orders to be enforced if and when they separated again.

47. Turning to the issue of stereotypes, she said that women in common-law marriages were not looked down upon and that such relationships were widely accepted by society.

48. The State party had not yet found a solution to the issue of perpetrators of sexual abuse who paid the families of their victims to avoid prosecution. Families accepted such payment out of need, and although the police could press charges against the alleged perpetrator, the case would eventually be dropped if the parties denied the allegations and failed to provide the necessary evidence in court.

49. In response to Ms. Arocha Domínguez's question about sex tourism, she said that Saint Vincent and the Grenadines catered to wealthy tourists; if prostitution existed, it was not very visible. The State party did not have any data on prostitution and could not cite any cases or convictions related to sex tourism. There had been an isolated incident in which a foreign worker had pressed charges against a woman for stealing from him, where the woman had claimed to be prostitute collecting her fees, but the charges laid had not been related to prostitution. The State party did not have a specific programme for women who wished to abandon prostitution, but it did have support programmes for unemployed women in general.

50. Lastly, there had no recent arrests of women trafficking drugs, and the State party did not have any data on female drug mules.

51. Ms. Arocha Domínguez pointed out that, although prostitution was perhaps more visible in areas of mass tourism, islands with high-end tourism could also be hotbeds of prostitution. In any event, the Convention did not prohibit prostitution per se, but rather the exploitation of prostitution.

52. Turning to the issue of drug mules, she said that drug trafficking was an issue that affected the entire region and that it must also exist in Saint Vincent and the Grenadines.

53. Ms. Acosta Vargas said that the State party should clarify whether the Domestic Violence Act provided for mandatory legal aid. What would be the average cost of providing legal aid to women victims? She asked whether the State party monitored non-domestic forms of violence, such as rape and femicide, which were not necessarily covered by the Act. Lastly, she wished to know how the State party disseminated amendments to legislation and ensured that the public was made aware of such changes.

54. Ms. Ellis Browne (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines), in response to Ms. Arocha Domínguez's comment, said that the police had noted an increase in the number of men trafficking drugs by boat, which perhaps accounted for the lack of female mules.

55. Ms. Finch Burke (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that the amendments to the Domestic Violence Act had been adopted only in April 2015 and had not yet been gazetted or disseminated.

56. The availability of legal aid for women had been one of the concerns addressed in the recent legislative consultations. However, details of the resultant regulatory framework could not be revealed until the new law had been promulgated. Rape was addressed in the Domestic Violence Act but femicide was not defined as a discrete offence, nor was its incidence directly monitored. Activities to raise awareness of the new legislative framework were included on the post-2015 agenda. The need for an effective sensitization programme had also been addressed in the national action plan, the Country Gender Assessment and other gender-sensitive programmes.

57. Ms. Acosta Vargas asked whether women were required to seek legal representation and advice before initiating proceedings.

58. Ms. Ellis Browne (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that responsibility for decisions as to whether or not to take a case to court lay with the police, not the person filing the complaint. If the police decided to take her case to court, the woman concerned would be called as a witness but would not be involved in preparing the case. Women's need for assistance was therefore limited to the provision of support and advice. Responding to a request for clarification from the Chairperson, she confirmed that police officers had the discretion to decide not to proceed with a case.

59. Ms. Bailey asked whether the State party had developed data-collection strategies and protocols to address the dearth of statistics evident in the periodic report, and how the data it collected were collated and used. Noting that the definition of rape contained in the new domestic violence legislation was narrow, she asked whether the Government had considered adopting the definition proposed in the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) model bill, which was much broader. She also wished to know whether access to shelters was subject to a court order, or whether women at risk were able to approach a shelter directly.

60. Ms. Finch Burke (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that the country's data-collection systems had been upgraded since 2010 and that a review of information-sharing protocols was currently under way. The CARICOM definition of rape had been given careful consideration but she was unable to comment on its likely adoption. Access to a shelter was available before as well as after the issue of a protection order, so women did not need to apply to the courts to gain access to protected accommodation.

Articles 7 to 9

61. Ms. Nwankwo said that the State party's decision not to adopt a quota system to increase women's representation in political and public office gave cause for concern in view of the very low number of women in decision-making positions. Although women were well represented in the civil service overall, in most cases they occupied low-level administrative positions and in the diplomatic service the predominance of men was striking. She urged the State party to give further consideration to the possibility of introducing a minimum 30 per cent quota for women in government and senior civil service positions.

62. Information about any State-sponsored mentoring and support programmes for women seeking to participate in political or public life would be appreciated, as would details of any targeted training programmes to promote female leadership. She also wished to know what the State party was doing to address the systemic lack of gender-disaggregated data.

63. Ms. Zou Xioaqiao said that, although the law gave women and men equal rights to apply for a change of nationality, the provisions that made a married woman's right to pass her nationality on to a non-national husband subject to the discretion of a government minister appeared discriminatory. Did the same discretion apply in respect of a husband's right to pass his nationality to a foreign wife? She would appreciate confirmation that all remaining discriminatory nationality provisions had been, or were due to be, removed from national law. She also requested clarification as to whether mothers were under an obligation to obtain the father's signature on the passport applications of their children, as indicated in the section of the State party's report relating to article 9 of the Convention. The State party's replies to the list of issues contradicted that statement and she wondered if the situation had changed since the report's publication.

64. Ms. Ellis Browne (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that quotas might be introduced if constitutional reforms were to go ahead. Although women were poorly represented in the Foreign Service overall, a second female ambassador had recently been appointed and, with their increasing participation in tertiary education, more and more women were expected to advance into senior positions in the future. A considerable change in cultural attitudes was still needed, nonetheless. Political life tended to be aggressive and demanding; women were often constrained by domestic responsibilities and simply unable or unwilling to take on the physical and emotional challenge of campaigning.

65. Ms. Finch Burke (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines) said that the need for a more even gender balance in Government was recognized and that the use of quotas was being given due consideration. To date, campaigns to promote women to leadership positions had tended to focus on less high-profile occupations, such as women in agriculture in marginalized areas, but the Country Gender Assessment had identified a clear need to extend and expand such initiatives. A review and amendment of all remaining discriminatory provisions in nationality and passport legislation, as well as a harmonization of all child and gender-related legislation, were included on the post-2015 agenda.

66. Ms. Nwankwo asked whether a quota system might not be introduced via electoral law if no constitutional reforms were envisaged in the near future.

67. Ms. Finch Burke (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines), responding to requests for clarification from Ms. Zou Xioaqiao and Ms. Bailey, said that the Country Gender Assessment had been approved in April 2015 only and was not yet available for consultation online. She would need to seek external clarification before responding to the questions about legislation on passport applications.

68. One of the recommendations resulting from the Country Gender Assessment had been that electoral law should be used as a tool for legislative amendments related to the use of quotas. That possibility had since been discussed by the Cabinet and details of the discussions would be released in the near future.

Articles 10 to 14

69. Ms. Bailey said that information about the impact of the measures taken to improve the educational situation of rural children and children from underprivileged homes, which were mentioned in the section of the periodic report relating to article 10 of the Convention, would be useful. Had the efficacy of the measures been assessed, had they improved attendance and performance, and were gender-disaggregated data available to support the findings? She would also appreciate receiving information about the impact of measures taken to ensure that adolescent mothers were able to return to formal education. She would particularly like to know how many girls had benefited, given that, according to the report, public awareness of the measures was limited.

70. The State party's replies to the list of issues cited the Health and Family Life Education curriculum as one of the main tools for combating the high rate of teenage pregnancy. Could the delegation confirm that the curriculum was offered at all levels of education in an age-appropriate manner and that a gender perspective was adopted in addressing power relationships between the sexes and decisions about sexual behaviour?

71. The rejection of the constitutional reform bill meant that the proposed provisions on equal employment opportunities would not be implemented and that alternative measures were needed to address the fact that the rate of unemployment among women with secondary qualifications was double the rate among men with the same level of education, even though girls outperformed boys in school. Information about those measures, and, more generally, about efforts to dismantle the cultural stereotypes and curriculum segregation that constrained women, was therefore needed. For example, did the career fairs mentioned in the report promote non-traditional views of gender-appropriate subjects and careers? She would also appreciate clarification as to whether the information contained in the report applied equally to the Grenadines and to Saint Vincent. Did girls in the Grenadines have to travel to Saint Vincent for their education or did all inhabited islands have their own schooling facilities?

72. Ms. Gbedemah said that more information about measures to reduce gender segregation and female underemployment and increase women's participation in the labour force, particularly in non-traditional higher-paid sectors, was needed. Measures of that kind were vital, in view of the State party's acknowledgement, in its opening statement, that care responsibilities often left women with little time to pursue paid employment and were a major contributor to poverty. She would particularly like to know: what steps had been taken to prevent application of the excessively broad, protectionist ban on the employment of women on night shifts in industrial undertakings; what mechanisms were being used to transform gender stereotypes through schooling, parenting and social expectations; whether the State party might consider using temporary special measures to accelerate that transformation; whether the private sector was contributing to the education authorities' efforts to bridge the gender gap; and whether financial and investment opportunities were available to promote female entrepreneurship.

73. Information about efforts to promote decent working conditions for domestic workers would also be useful, as would comparative wage data for men and women and details of the financial and human resources available to support implementation of the ILO conventions ratified by the State party.

74. Lastly, she asked what plans and timelines were in place for laws and policies that criminalized sexual harassment in all sectors. She had been concerned to read in the State party's report that women might sometimes be asked to provide sexual favours in order to be offered work and wished to know whether research into the incidence of that phenomenon had been conducted, and, if so, what the findings had been. Details of the remedies available, beyond the common-law remedies under the law of tort mentioned in the report, would also be appreciated. She urged the State party to consider adopting a comprehensive law on sexual harassment and, in the meantime, in the absence of a comprehensive law, to ensure that a comprehensive complaints mechanism was in place.

The meeting rose at 1 p.m.
