Regional realities: Asia-Pacific Day

Summary submitted by the Chairman of the Forum

1. The moderated panel discussion “Regional Realities: Asia-Pacific Day” was the latest special event in a series of regional presentations started in 2003 at the third session of the United Nations Forum on Forests to share ideas, perspectives and strategies to promote sustainable forest management. It showcased and affirmed the crucial role of forests and trees in sustainable development in the Asia-Pacific region.

Policy recommendations highlighted in the discussion

2. Asia and the Pacific is the world’s most populous region. Fifty-five per cent of the world’s population lives in the Asia-Pacific region, placing immense pressure on its forests. Panellists discussed: current trends; gaps and challenges for sustainable forest management in the regions such as loss of forest cover, land degradation owing to high population density in forests, illegal logging and other corrupt activities; inappropriate use of forest subsidies; violent conflict in forested areas; unsustainable management plans; and inadequate forest certification efforts. In addition, the panellists shared national experiences on gender-based initiatives to empower women through community-based forest management, establishing coastal forests, the regional cooperation efforts of the Asia Forest Partnership and strategies to alleviate poverty through forest management.

3. Areas that could improve the implementation of sustainable forest management were identified as: valuation and payment for environmental services, criteria and indicators for sustainable forest management, credible certification schemes with compliance verification, adequate financing, capacity-building, social mobilization strategies, land tenure reform and bilateral and multilateral cooperation. Emphasis was made on the need to formulate an implementation strategy and follow-up action, including an efficient and effective feedback mechanism within and across national, regional and international levels.

4. The meeting concluded that the panel discussion had broadened understanding and demonstrated the potential of subregional and regional approaches in the future work of the international arrangement on forests to address existing challenges and emerging sustainable forest management issues.
Annex II

Role of forests in the follow-up to the outcome of the Millennium Summit and integrated and coordinated implementation of and follow-up to the outcomes of major United Nations conferences and summits in the economic and social fields

Summary submitted by the Chairman of the Forum

1. Forests and trees play a critical role in supporting the livelihoods of people, particularly the world’s poor. Forest resources directly contribute to the livelihoods of 90 per cent of the 1.2 billion people living in extreme poverty who depend on forests to enrich their soil, provide nutrition for their livestock and protect their water supply. For these people, forests are a source of food, energy, shelter, medicine, commerce and spiritual well-being. Finding means of managing forests in a more sustainable way is thus crucial for achieving the internationally agreed development goals, including those contained in the Millennium Declaration.

2. The plenary session was organized as a policy dialogue between ministers, heads of member organizations of the Collaborative Partnership on Forests and high-level representatives of major groups. The session was moderated by Ms. Buyelwa Patience Sonjica, Minister of Water Affairs and Forestry of South Africa.

Policy recommendations highlighted in the discussion

3. Efforts to defeat poverty and pursue sustainable development will be in vain if degradation and natural resource depletion, including loss of forests and illegal activities in the forest sector, continue unabated. Where forests play a critical role in enabling people to cope with poverty, their rights should be safeguarded by providing and securing of tenure and access to wood and non-timber forest products. Furthermore, efforts to tackle these challenges and make strides towards sustainable forests management needs to be strengthened at all levels, including a strong international arrangement on forests.

4. The alarming rate of deforestation continues to warrant international attention and there is a need to renew the pledge to combat deforestation, restoring the forest functions in degraded landscapes and improve the livelihoods of poor people living in and around forests worldwide. Several participants stressed that setting global forest goals in this regard may serve as a catalyst for action at all levels and stimulate countries to set their own target to fulfil this commitment. Furthermore, such common goals could also be conveyed to the High-level Plenary Meeting of the sixtieth session of the General Assembly, at which heads of State and Government would participate to comprehensively review the implementation of the Millennium Declaration.

5. Several delegations stressed the need to increase resource mobilization, both domestically and externally, for sustainable forests management and the achievement of the Millennium Development Goals. Capacity-building, research and transfer of environmentally sound technologies were also highlighted as priorities in order to make significant progress on the ground.

6. Some delegations highlighted that forests are deeply entwined with other sectors of society and their management requires coordinated efforts and intersectoral approaches. National forest programmes provide an excellent framework within which countries can address the opportunities for trees and forests to contribute to broader development objectives.
Annex III

Round table on restoring the world’s forests

Summary submitted by the Chairman of the Forum

1. Despite the alarming rate of deforestation, new strategies have been implemented and are emerging to address this critical matter and to further our understanding of the underlying driving forces. To this end, forest restoration, the natural expansion of forest and the establishment of plantation forests have helped, to some extent, in countering degradation of forest ecosystems and to bring environmental, commercial and social benefits to society.

2. The round table was chaired by Mr. Elliot Morley, Minister of State (Climate Change and Environment), Department for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

3. The round table provided an opportunity for ministers, heads of member organizations of the Collaborative Partnership on Forests and participants in the high-level major group to discuss ways to secure greater political recognition of the importance of restoring the world’s forests and to achieving high-level commitments to restoration, including those contained in the Millennium Declaration.

Policy recommendations highlighted in the discussion

4. Among contributing factors identified by Governments during the discussion to help diminish adverse effect on forests by decisions taken outside the forest sector was the need for closer collaboration with other ministries, including ministries of agriculture and environment, in order to advance sustainable forest management and forest restoration. The future of forests is indeed linked to a good balance within the rural policies of any country.

5. The development of a financial mechanism to assess the value of forest services and benefits and to attract greater interest on forests by decision makers in charge of finance was also underlined as a factor that could stimulate Governments to play a supportive role in forest restoration. Exploring innovative sources of funding could potentially lead to new opportunities for the forest sector, such as increasing the revenue generated from forest resources; promoting forest-related business opportunities and charging for environmental services; stimulating international cooperation; encouraging private sector investment; mobilizing incentives for sustainable forest management practices among small forest landowners, and other stakeholders; promoting private-public partnerships; and using various schemes, such as the clean development mechanism, to finance projects relevant to forests.

6. Formulation and implementation of national forest programmes, with clear targets and expectations, and with the active engagement of stakeholders, including women and youth, could strategically improve forest restoration. This would influence other national development policies and bring greater political attention to the management, conservation and sustainable development of forests.

7. Recommendations expressed during the round table included, to: focus particularly on regions and countries where the restoration of forests is mostly needed; support regional activities on forest restoration, through existing processes, such as the criteria and indicator processes and the Tehran Process for low forest cover countries, as well as partnerships such as the Global Partnership on Forest Restoration; urge the Forum and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) to facilitate the transfer of environmentally sound forest restoration technology and support capacity-building; urge the Forum to seek ways and means to establish a finance mechanism for forest restoration; and, also urge the Forum to provide information and assistance to countries to establish clear linkages with the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification and the clean development mechanism under the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change.
Annex IV

Forest law and governance for sustainability

Summary submitted by the Chairman of the Forum

1. Mrs. Judith Bahemuka, Permanent Representative of Kenya to the United Nations, moderated a diverse and constructive discussion that recognized the fundamental importance of governance for sustainable forest management and the negative link between conflicts and natural resource conservation. In many countries weak governance is associated with poverty. The sharing of the experience of rich countries identified the numerous actions at international, regional, subregional and national levels as potentially useful tools to strengthen forest law and governance for sustainability.

Policy recommendations highlighted in the discussion

2. The need to strengthen national legislation and enforcement was highlighted as a priority area. Regional initiatives, multilateral and bilateral cooperation and agreements also have a significant role to play in strengthening forest law enforcement and governance.

3. Clarification and strengthening of tenure and access rights related to forest lands and use was one of the suggested actions. Decentralization and promotion of partnerships between Governments, forest owners and communities, industry and trade and civil society further contribute to better forest governance.

4. Another indispensable attribute of good governance is transparency of Government contracts and payments related to the use rights of forest resources, as well as of efficient and equitable revenue-sharing schemes.

5. Certification of origin of timber and timber products, chain-of-custody systems and voluntary codes of conduct are important tools in combating illegal practices in forestry. On the other hand, market access to legally and sustainably produced forest products, including public procurement rules need to be enhanced, together with transfer of technology and sharing of experiences. Provision of adequate means of implementation, including capacity-building and technical and financial assistance, are crucial preconditions for strengthening governance systems.
